

It seems that most people don't like the apology I've written because I said all this happened because I couldn't control myself. I took the whole day to think about it, and now I understand that it isn't okay to give excuses for something this serious.

I should have taken accountability without deflecting blame, and I regret the way I handled it. I recognize that saying I couldn't control myself isn't the right way to address all this, and I am sorry for that. With this in mind, I'm currently trying my best to learn about consent and boundaries, because I fucked up a lot.

I know and understand that words aren't enough to rebuild my trust. I don't also really expect forgiveness immediately (or even at all for most of the people), but I really want to show that I'm working on myself really hard and changing as a person.

For a quick recap of what happened, I messaged 2 people inappropriately, both of them underaged. And I understand how damaging this can be, not only for the people involved, but also for the community I was a part of, and I'm truly sorry.

I deceived a lot of people with my actions, and I'm willing to change for them, even though they probably wouldn't accept me back.

Thanks for reading. I'll continue to reflect on myself and get better everyday.

Once again, I am deeply sorry.
